Ilhan Sami Çomak and Caroline Stockford poetry collaboration April 2020

First stanzas of Ilhan, responded with second stanza by Caroline 1-5.

1. Light hits the seas within me.
The questions are immense.
It's like freshness is rising from fine climates Like I'm gathering flowers, gathering countless pleasures from touch.
Breeze is blowing from the future.
My breath corrals the excitement Remind me of the law of the wave, fluent and formidable.
Let life become new! Let hunger rise up, from just-made bread and the thought of poppies wet by new rain grow clearer Your lip is red with the taste of a first kiss bring new fires with your body, I'll wash myself anew.

The sea's law is made by its wave, it turns back to wildness the green glass surface, waves run far from their home, to abate on the sand, they return depleted.
We wave to one another from our white wooden boats, I look for you each time I crest a wave. You are there, and children write your poems on the beach.
The bell of a first kiss is on my tongue, I have forgotten everyone.
I've grown deaf in this world of war cries.
I need the sea and your dazzling.
With poems we fling a lasso at sky.
Suddenly I'm flying.
Yes, life becomes new.

2. Perhaps they tell you my name, as my face breaks up in a broken mirror
What do you expect from a silhouette?
Let water pour from my tearfilled eyes and let us go silent together, time and again, in darkness.
So that different scents may mature, rising from the body of life, flowing to us, around us, filling to fulness with all-new aromas.
Other suns are dawning, can you see them?
As last the knot of love is being undone
I've been embraced, I've seen, I've come.

If we have no names how can we know each other? Your inner sea is clear in poetry. I don't know the face of the new-born moon. Let the knot of love unfold like a flower.
Let it shine without shadow, as soft as April's suns. I can't see the new sun it's shining power is blinding. I open my eyes in the cinnamon garden. At last my courage is blooming like spring buds.
My burden lends its weight to earth, my back is light, oh life! I am embraced.

3.
I want to tell you of waters today
Of the smell of cut roses in baskets of my desire to climb the willow tree and of longings that have faded to memories.
To tell you how the anger is sown, when my mind plays its broken record, calling Life tripped me up! It went and tripped me up!
Where will the sun rise? I want to talk about this and the most simple reasons for crying in the rain. The sky has a strange way of caressing.
There is a sound to budding leaves and to forgottenness. The sun will be born from my palm!
I want to tell you about this, and of the trembling of the wind that swims over my body.

Your body's like a tree, each leaf is a poem the curious wind plays every one, and we,
on our far islands, hear the music of your news.
We measure endings with the setting sun.
That ceaseless star will not stop, pouring gold.
Tell me the rain's secrets, on the mountain slopes at a quarter to dawn. I would tell you, too, of the vision of that day, when I saw the horizon rise up, of the inner worlds of patience and possibility, but you know all these better than me. Tell me of your miracles, I'm listening.
4.
I had a pomegranate, quinces, I spent time in the ripening of fruit. It was morning. And they saw the summer sun overflow from me.
With the eternal beauty of my childhood
I said, Fall down, you mountain! Cease, you winds!
They threw stones at me. We got there, and they threw stones at me. I was sleepless. The birds were warbling in full flow. The waters were torpid, my steps a little rushed. I said, The names of flowers are spinning in my head, their memories, their scents are trembling on and on. But they threw stones at me from that place called life.
Did you see? Did anyone?

I won't turn away my head, and there's no escape from now. We are what it means to live, it's us, and all the stones we touch will one day return to sand. The hand of patience puts everything in its place, in time. I can't tell this to the weary mountains, or the fretful seas, they are both older than me. Birds fly over heads of good and bad, led on by vibrations. And if it reflects our face, does water not also see us? We wear the things we know like new brooches. The mountains are laughing at us, showers of falling stones are chuckling.
In my hand I will catch every stone they threw at you.

5.
First I thought of the freshness of the shade in which I hide. The sound of the city, mountain's distant grandeur. And the clumsy attempts of fledglings as they try to land on branches. I grew thirsty, so thirsty and thought of other lives. I thought long and hard, with no view on which to rest my eyes, of darkness and the sun. My mind asks,
What is it to thrust out green leaves?
What is it to work, build up a sweat, to tire thanks to labour, from beautiful hard work? No matter in which stream I bathe, the waters are so bitter.

Look! See your form in the shaded corner of the lake. There floats the crown of a daffodil swimming like a yellow ghost. It's petals are seeping towards the silence of transparency. There is strength in the elipses, where petals overlap, we are strong in the space we make between us. Come, let us climb Idris's mighty mountain, let the valiant memories of your muscles return. Let sweat shine, and not tears.
